

REFORMULATING REFORMED THEOLOGY

*Jesus Christ in the Theology
of
Hugh Ross Mackintosh*

Robert R. Redman, Jr.

1997

believed that process can and ought to be continuously refined and improved with new conceptual tools, he essentially followed the path of the great theologians of the Church's history. His relevance for modern theology consists in the helpful and insightful expression he gave to what is truly relevant, namely, the gospel itself. Although he anticipated some important later developments in christology and soteriology, he was also clearly limited to his own era. But his significance for theology today is not found in the predictions that came true, or the trend setting formulations he left behind, but rather in the way he fixed his theological attention on Jesus Christ and with remarkable consistency was able to spell out the implications of the gospel for the Church's proclamation.

The legacy of H.R. Mackintosh for theology today is thus a challenge to take with utter seriousness the amazing message that God has come savingly among humanity in Jesus, has offered himself on the cross for the forgiveness of humanity's sin, and offers today an unimpeded communion with him through the Spirit. In order to appreciate what Hugh Ross Mackintosh achieved it is not necessary to repeat what he said over fifty years ago. To appreciate him today is to take up the task of constructing christology and soteriology as he did: joyfully and humbly, with awe and reverence.
